

OFFICIAL COMMUNITY CALENDAR AND METHOD

Abstract

A multi-part community calendar having titles of important events in the pages near the front. A user would turn the pages to find the detailed information corresponding to the event titles. Advertising is found on the various pages, and coupons for goods and services relevant to the community would follow. A community calendar page can be provided after the event descriptions, having miscellaneous community information. A business method for producing this calendar includes the steps of receiving and re-searching community information from the public, preferably by electronic data input. A community administrator also receives advertising and coupons from businesses, and rates charged are related to the total number of households in the community. A calendar for one particular period is published at a time, preferably monthly. The calendar is distributed free of charge to every household in the community.
